Comprehension:

Read the given passage and answer the following questions.

The human mind suffers from three ailments as it comes into contact with history, what I call the triplet of opacity. They are: (a) the illusion of understanding, or how everyone thinks they knows what is going on in a world that is more complicated (or random) than they realise; (b) the retrospective distortion, or how we can assess matters only after the fact, as if they were in a rear-view mirror (history seems clearer and more organised in history books than in empirical reality); and (c) the overvaluation of factual information and the handicap of authoritative and learned people, particularly when they create categories—when they “Platonify”. Platonify, derived from platonicity, is named after the ideas of the philosopher Plato. It is a tendency to mistake the map for the territory, focus more on forms than the less tractable structures. It is what makes us think that we understand more than we actually do.

Read the given passage and answer the following questions.

After a mutation changes an individual, the environment determines if the change gives the individual an advantage. If the new trait is helpful, the mutated individual is more likely to survive, reproduce and pass the new trait to his children. Take a poisonous spider as an example. Assume that a population (a group of individuals belonging to one species that occupy the same geographic/ecological niche at the same time) of black widows differs in how toxic their venom is. If some spiders (mutants) are born with more toxins than others, two things could happen over time. If more toxins give an advantage in the spiders' environment, more toxins might be 'selected' for and the 'more-toxins' characteristic might be passed to children. If the more toxic black widow spiders survive and reproduce better than the less toxic ones, then black widow spiders, will, over time, evolve more toxic venom. The frequency of the 'more-toxic' spiders in the population increases over time. If there is no advantage, the trait disappears and the population of less toxic spiders increases.

Memory also holds the vast repertory of skills we have acquired in a lifetime of practice, which automatically produce adequate solutions to challenges as they arise, from walking around a large stone on the path to averting the incipient outburst of a customer. The acquisition of skills requires a regular environment, an adequate opportunity to practice, and rapid and unequivocal feedback about the correctness of thoughts and actions. When these conditions are fulfilled, skill eventually develops, and the intuitive judgments and choices that quickly come to mind will mostly be accurate. All this is the work of System 1, which means it occurs automatically and fast. A marker of skilled performance is the ability to deal with vast amounts of information swiftly and efficiently. When a challenge is encountered to which a skilled response is available, that response is evoked.

Read the given passage and answer the following questions.

Well I'm in the working world again. I've found myself a well-paying gig in the engineering industry, and life finally feels like it's returning to normal after my nine months of traveling. Because I had been living quite a different lifestyle while I was away, this sudden transition to 9-to-5 existence has exposed something about it that I overlooked before. Since the moment I was offered the job, I've been markedly more careless with my money. Not stupid, just a little quick to pull out my wallet. As a small example, I'm buying expensive coffees again, even though they aren't nearly as good as New Zealand's exceptional flat whites, and I don't get to savor the experience of drinking them on a sunny café patio. When I was away these purchases were less off-handed, and I enjoyed them more. I'm not talking about big, extravagant purchases. I'm talking about small-scale, casual, promiscuous spending on stuff that doesn't really add a whole lot to my life. And I won't actually get paid for another two weeks. In hindsight I think I've always done this when I've been well-employed — spending happily during the "flush times." Having spent nine months living a no-income backpacking lifestyle, I can't help but be a little more aware of this phenomenon as it happens. I suppose I do it because I feel I've regained a certain stature, now that I am again an amply-paid professional, which seems to entitle me to a certain level of wastefulness. There is a curious feeling of power you get when you drop a couple of twenties without a trace of critical thinking. It feels good to exercise that power of the dollar when you know it will "grow back" pretty quickly anyway. What I'm doing isn't unusual at all. Everyone else seems to do this. In fact, I think I've only returned to the normal consumer mentality after having spent some time away from it.
