Read the passage and choose the best alternative. Q. Nos. 41 to 45 :

Executive coaching is an in-depth professional intervention which enhances managerial functioning through multiple interactions with key executives, one-on-one or in groups.

Coaching is most effective when it includes senior level officials, as it then helps change mindsets, and influence behaviour throughout their organizations. It is customised to the specific needs of employees, is based on - the job experience, has direct application to work situations and thrives on the feed-back of participants. The exercise involves continual guidance, follow-ups and learning.

Shyam Viswanthan, Chief Executive, Corporate Education, Grow Talent, defines executive coaching as, "The process of helping an executive 'develop' by turning his day-to-day work situations into learning opportunities, in a planned manner - and by helping him reflect on the learning to become more capable than he previously was."

However, misconceptions about this kind of coaching still persist, says Aanal Bhagwati, Principal Consultant, Human Capital Management, Ahmedabad, "In our country coaching is looked at in a very negative manner. It is often kept a secret, which goes against its prime objective."

Executive coaching usually involves three parties - the coach, the coached and the client (or employer), who pays for the service. It is different from conventional training, which often does not have long-term benefits, and also the mentors hired do not feel the responsibility to execute the core values. "The executive coach supports the coached over an extended period till he has acquired the competencies required for his job."

"Executive coaching does not involve any fixed pattern or methodology of training. It is tailored to the needs and the objectives of a client." The content of coaching is not pre-determined and does not follow a fixed programme. It is decided by the coached. It is said that the coached decides the agenda, and the coach guides him or her.

Some main elements of coaching include "Active Listening, Powerful Questions, and Direct Communication."

The coach need not be from the same functional area. A good coach always promotes the skill to ask the right question at the right time that helps in finding the perfect path.

Coaching a leader can help change his style and behaviour and this can further enhance the effectiveness of his team. This method is also beneficial for small and budding companies to move ahead and grow in a well-planned manner. "Coaching helps an executive reflect on his performance in a specific area with the assistance of an informed, objective coach. The focus is not only on using the knowledge and skills but also on reviewing attitude and approach."

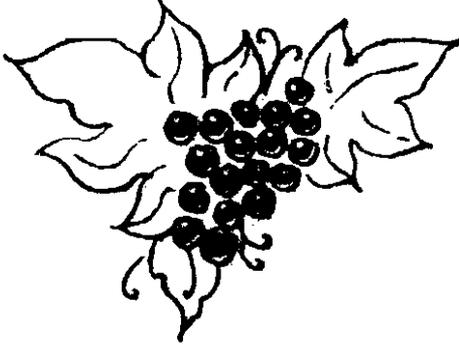

The concept to executive coaching is not new to the world. It has flourished in the US and produced magnificent outcome. However, in our country, coaching is still in its formative stages. It needs to be understood that coaching is not always a remedial measure but more of a developmental technique. The experience of the US and European corporate shows that executive coaching delivers a better return on investment than other investments in capacity building.

Research indicates a spectacular improvement in performance after coaching. A more intensive use of coaching will be a cost-effective way to improve the competitiveness of Indian corporate in global markets.

Read the following passage and answer the questions given below it. Q. Nos. 46 to 50 :

She told Matthew the story the next morning. Matthew was confounded and puzzled; he could not so quickly lose faith in Anne but he had to admit that circumstances were against her.

"Well now, what are you going to do about it?" Matthew asked forlornly, feeling secretly thankful that Marilla and not he had to deal with the situation.

"She'll stay in her room until she confesses," said Marilla grimly. "Then we'll see. Perhaps we'll be able to find the brooch if she'll only tell where she took it; but in any case she'll have to be severely punished, Matthew."

Anne steadfastly refused to confess. She persisted in asserting that she had not taken the brooch. The child had evidently been crying and Marilla felt a pang of pity which she sternly repressed.

"You'll stay in this room until you confess, Anne. You can make up your mind to that," she said firmly.

"But the picnic is tomorrow, Marilla," cried Anne. "You won't keep me from going to that, will you? You'll just let me out for the afternoon, won't you? Then I'll stay here as long as you like AFTERWARDS cheerfully. But I MUST go to the picnic."

"You'll not go to picnics nor anywhere else until you've confessed, Anne."

"Oh, Marilla," gasped Anne.

But Marilla had gone out and shut the door.
